THURSDAY MORNING, JANUARY 28, 1858.

The midnight mass of Christmas eve was celebrated at the Magdeleine in all its wonted splendor, and once more attracted vast crowds to its solemn and striking ordinances. By 10 o'clock the vast interior of the Magdeleine, incomparably nobler and more imposing when lighted up at night than when seen under the dull, imprisoned rays forced into it ungracefully and unwillingly by day, was coupied by a dense assemblage, filling area, ter with a description of their condition, (age tribunes, and upper galleries, and waiting patiently two hours for a ceremony which was to endure two hours more from its commencement. Nothing could be more orderly and edifying than the general aspect of this age, and will furnish the most approved medimmense congregation, composed almost in em treatment. equal numbers of men and women, and of every rank of the population, from highest to assured that their labors in this sphere of benevlowest. The rich and drawing-room-like de- olent effort, have been of great benefit to the afcorations of this magnificent church put forth all their splendors for the occasion, and the eye was dazzled by the display on all sides of rich draperies, carpets and gorgeous candelabras and priestly vestments, sparkling under a blaze of light, in the midst of which the superb white marble altar with its lofty figure of the Virgin, borne aloft by winged angels of gigantic size-one of the finest works of Pradier-lifted itself and its bright illuminations as a sun light centre of attraction. From time to time M. l'Abte Daguerry, the Cure of the Magdeleine, crossed the spacious platform before the altar and scanned the congregation with his keen eye, to see whether the enormous ed fice would get hold more ere the doors were shu'-- 1 regulation very properly adopted before the service begins, especially at such an hour of the night, and with the motley and irregular crowd which congregates around the building out si 'e, and which puts a stop also to that perpetual ingress and egress and shuffling and scuffling of feet so disagreeable to the ears of an English churchman in continental places the unequalled organ poured out a gush of its liquid notes, and at the same time a whole company of priests, in their golden draperies, issued forth from a side door, and with that exquisite scenie effect, better known or more imposingly practiced in no other stage, streamed off, each bearing the Holy Sacrament, and accompanied by his attendant ministers and cross-bearer, to every alter within the sacred precincts, and midnight mass began. "Que voulez vous?" said a Freuchman, in answer to a remark I made, "we have need of this sort of thing, vous autres, the different nature of your services, pre supposes an internal and individual train of devotion which is not generally found among us, or requires at least a stronger stimulant to draw it forth." To a looker-on, on Thursday night, the devotional, though excited, aspect of the vast multitude which filled the Magdeleine, was highly edifying. and the most gratifying feature of the ceremonial. The performance of the mass itself,

When he felt himself overpowered, he broke out into a hearty laugh, but suddenly resuming a smile of derision, he exclaimed-"What! ten to one! Then Olimski is taken." This sounded very well, and helped to add to the effect produced on the occasion. Another incident, connected with his arrest, will bear repeating:

During the absence of the pawnbroker. (after the officers,) and while Olimski was alone in the room, a couple of strange looking persons approached the door and got sight of the prisoner.

"What think you?" asked one of them, addressing his companion, who was peering with all his might through the key hole, "Is it be?" "It is."

"No--it cannot be. And yet those eyesthat mouth-that nose-that mark-it is the long looked for Olimski!"

"S-e-i-z-e the villain!" shouted the other. Here a grand flourish ensued, but nobody
